Who is this module aimed at?

Social workers and other professionals working in health and social care.

What and how will I learn?

This module explores social interactions with death and dying. It aims to take a creative approach to death, dying and bereavement in social work, health and social care.

Teaching will take place through 6 three-hour sessions across the University's spring term.

The aim of the module is to create a space for practitioners to consider their own approaches and experiences of death, as well as the emotional impact of the death of an adult or child they are working with, while learning about recent theories, policies and practices in the field.

You can choose to take the module at an undergraduate or postgraduate level. Whilst both will receive the same taught content, the module assessment will be tailored to meet either BA Year 3 or MA standards.
